Tales from the Shadow Booth Vol. 1 is the first volume of a new journal dedicated to weird and eerie horror the best kind. I might be biased (I was a Kickstarter backer for the publication of this book), but this really is a high-quality collection, with a much higher hit rate than the vast majority of horror anthologies.

In the 1994 movie starring Alec Baldwin, the Shadow was a combination of the radio character and the pulp hero. When the Shadow reached the world of comics, it was as this blended character. The Shadow was the merciless foe of organized crime, a creature of the night with a shuddering laugh and blazing 45's.

These are only my favourite stories. All are worth reading, none worth skipping (unless you already have Tales from the Shadow Booth, vol. 1, in which case you'll already know Alison Moore's 'The Stone Dead' which is good, but in this company feels like a filler). A good read for the Christmas holidays. Or the January commute.

Creepy is an American horror-comics anthology launched by Warren Publishing in 1964. Like Mad, it was a black-and-white newsstand publication in a magazine format and thus did not require the approval or seal of the Comics Code Authority. The anthology magazine was initially published quarterly but later went bimonthly. Each issue's stories were introduced by the host character, Uncle Creepy.

Comfortably ensconced in a breakfast nook, poet D. Nurkse discussed the architecture of Butler's Efromyson Center for Creative Writing (one way of talking about the relationship between labor and form), literary tradition, falling snow (visible through the window), and his parents leaving Europe as it disintegrated into World War II. We also discussed his use of baseball in poetry.
